ES.POPH.HMS 195-010 Global Environmental Health Disparities in Global Context

First Half Term - MW, 1600-1850

Professor Choi / CRN 21724 / REMT / 3 credits

Within this course, students will explore and investigate the role of environmental exposures on the health of the populations, particularly in low- to middle-income countries. We will also examine how social, demographic, economic and political attributes modify the association between environmental exposures and health outcomes. Such investigative framework will foster students' understanding of why certain global environmental pressures frequently pose the greatest burden on the most vulnerable populations. The course will also explore how the principles of environmental justice could help to improve the health status of the vulnerable populations.

ES.POPH.HMS 195-011 Global Environmental Pressures and Population Sustainability

Second Half Term - TR, 1600-1850

Professor Choi / CRN 21725 / REMT / 3 credits

Human behaviors are driving global environmental changes, including climate change, ozone depletion, biodiversity loss, nitrogen fertilization, and ocean acidification. Within this course, students will examine how the above global environmental pressures, either alone or collectively, influence human health and well-being. The above global environmental pressures are particularly associated with graver burden on populations in low- and middle-income countries. Students will explore global policies and strategies to fight such global environmental pressures for the improvement of human health and wellbeing.

This course addresses the effective management of nonprofit organizations. We start by reviewing the community, historical, social and legal contexts of the nonprofit sector in the U.S. These lead into the issues that are central to the course, relating to how nonprofits are managed. We examine structure and administration, leadership and management, marketing, finance, and resource development, and strategy, all in the nonprofit environment. We also highlight some concerns that are especially pressing for managers.
